- First monograph on this significant representative of Italy's post-war modernism
- Features rich and previously unpublished material
- Analyses a range of Ronca's buildings
- Documents all his preserved buildings in newly commissioned images by architectural photographer Werner Feiersinger

This is the first-ever monograph on Verona-born architect Armando Ronca (1901-70), a significant protagonist of Italy's post-war Modernism. Following his studies in engineering in Genoa, Torino, and Padova he started working as an architect in Trento before he established his own studio in Bolzano in 1935. Ronca soon became a leading proponent of Modernism in architecture in Northern Italy. In 1944, he opened a second studio in Milano, where the 1948 expansion of the San Siro football stadium in collaboration with the structural engineer Feruccio Calzolari was the largest single project of his entire career. This new book documents Ronca's life and work, featuring in detail some forty of his designs mainly in the Trentino-Alto Adige and Lombardy regions, richly illustrated with original plans and drawings by Ronca and period photographs. Newly commissioned images by Austrian architecture photographer Werner Feiersinger present all of Ronca's preserved buildings in their current state. Essays by Andreas Kofler, Massimo Martignoni, Giorgio Mezzalana, Magdalene Schmidt, Luigi Scolari, and Jörg Stabenow, and a complete catalogue of Ronca's built and unrealised projects and interior designs round out the book. Text in Italian and German. Published to accompany the exhibition Armando Ronca: Architettura del Moderno in Alto Adige 1935-1970, Merano Arte, 14 October 2017 to 7 January 2018.
